There are benefits for team-based reflection following a patient death: But are we doing it right’?
Professor Liz Anderson, Professor John Sandars and Dr Dan Kinnair will share their findings from a scoping review, for NHS Education for Scotland, on the nature and benefits of team-based professional reflection after a patient death. The need for a structured process for the reflection, with facilitation in a supportive healthcare context, appears to be essential for effective team-based reflection. The aim is to develop an agreed structure, through debate and discussion at the seminar, to ensure everyone involved feels valued and able to participate in meaningful team-based post death debriefing sessions.

Human Factors in Healthcare
Slides are available from the project teams who presented at the very successful ‘Human Factors in Healthcare’ seminar last week. The seminar, hosted by LIIPS, showcased and demonstrated the impact of some of the solutions that have been trialled locally in the NHS supported by East Midlands Patient Safety Collaborative in partnership with Health Education England, East Midlands.
